Historical Regions of Europe and Lithuania course introduces classical and contemporary concepts of European regional studies and analyses the perspectives of regional studies in Lithuanian historiography. A regional research approach based on a comparative research method could, on the one hand, provide a more integral (in the sense of context) view of Lithuanian history, and, on the other hand, would help to renew the historiography itself, allowing it to go beyond the format of national research. The course discusses the key concepts and theories used to construct spatial and temporal models of European regions. Among the European regions, the focus is on the concepts of Central Europe as a peripheral part of Western Europe and its eastern part (Central Eastern Europe). In this context, Lithuania's search for a regional identity is also analyzed. The specificity of Lithuania is explained by its peripheral position. Research on the historical regions of Europe is a fertile area for interdisciplinary dialogue, which could become another impulse for the methodological and thematic renewal of Lithuanian historiography.
